"We help communities develop their own ability to solve problems by bringing lots of people together in dialogue across divides of race, income, age, and political viewpoints. The center works with neighborhoods, cities and towns, regions, and states, paying particular attention to the racial and ethnic dimensions of the problems they address.

... This work has yielded innovative, effective tools and processes with a proven track record of furthering the efforts of people who are looking for ways to organize dialogue that leads to change where they live."

This is an interesting way to get people throughout a community together and support dialog on various issues. The site has lots of great resources and how-to guides that are thorough and free.
